HOPKINS ACADEMY.

This Institution takes its name from Edward Hopkins, the principal donor to the funds by which it is sustained, who in the year 1657, bequeathed a large sum for educational purposes, to "the foreign Plantations of New England." It is located in a healthy and pleasant village. Far removed from the noise of the city, it presents in its quiet retirement, and in its freedom from those temptations incident to our larger towns, peculiar attractions for the student. Situated amidst the most beautiful scenery of the Connecticut valley, it affords very desirable facilities for the cultivation of the taste and the elevation of the moral feelings.

The course of study pursued embraces the various branches requisite to a thorough English education, French, and the studies necessary to admission to College, and when desired, to an advanced standing.

It is the aim of the teachers to keep in mind those great objects, the attainment of which was the design of the founder of this Institution, viz. "the promotion of the cause of Christ, and the education of youth for the public service of their country."

In accordance with this aim, constant efforts are made to instill into the youthful mind those great moral and religious principles without which the increase of knowledge only increases the power of the individual to exert a deleterious influence on society.

The teachers while endeavoring faithfully to train the minds of their pupils, feel that this is emphatically a small part of the great work of education.
